Emergency Preparedness Week
May 1 – 7, 2022

How to be prepared for (almost) anything.

Canada's national Emergency Preparedness week is May 1-7. While you can't predict the next disaster or emergency, you can make events like last December's windstorm easier to cope with by having a plan and building an emergency kit.

Be prepared with these three steps:

1. Know the risks: What are the most likely hazards you face? A power outage? Being isolated by a road washout or snowstorm? A flood? Consider the risks, based on your location and what's happened in the past and add emergencies that could happen in our region, including windstorms and forest fires.

2. Plan ways to cope with the risks: If you had to leave, how would you get out? How would you alert members of your family or pick up your kids from school? How would you check in with neighbours, look after pets and livestock, and make sure your heating, water and electrical systems are safe?

3. Build an emergency kit: Most emergencies are short-term. If you can hunker down and get by, life usually returns to normal within 72 hours or less. That's why a kit should supply crucial needs for three days, including water, food, a phone and wind-up or battery-powered radio, first aid kit, important family documents, and other items including clothes, sleeping bags, etc.

For a full list of emergency kit items and more help with your plan, visit www.getprepared.gc.ca – and enjoy the summer knowing you're ready for pretty much anything.
